Although I loved "Anything Can Happen", the account of George Papashvily's arrival in America as an immigrant, I did not appreciate the propaganda in this book, published in 1973, which told of his return, now married, for a visit to his birthplace in Georgian Russia. In the midst of an ongoing celebration of the couple as they were feted in a series of many welcoming parties featuring an abundance of elaborate foods and wines, a large, black, gleaming limousine appeared to take them to their most highly anticipated destination, George's hometown of Kobiantkari. Page 53: "'Where does this come from?' I asked the man holding the door for us. 'Director of Intourist Palavandishvily's own Lim with his compliments and his driver. That's me, Levan.' He shook my hand." Helena, Papashvily's American-born wife, responds: "Nothing surpasses a Communist country when it comes to the luxuries of life." Hello? I hardly think so....

An odd account of Papashvily's return to Georgia, with his village and his growing-up in as well. Worth reading. .
